Students offered fun new way to pay tuition

By Yoda FlakeValve

Sub-Boss

Students have been complaining about the increase in tuition; however, they will now be able to receive a credit towards their bill if they "mow down" a pedestrian, according to Lala Binks, director of Student Financial Aid Services.

The new decision was implemented because of the recent thousand-dollar increase in tuition by the newly employed president of the University.

"We needed to be able to pay our staff better wages and what a better way to do that than raise the tuition again," said president elect Morpheus. "Basically if the students can give us a reason we will give them a credit."

Depending on how hard the person is hit will determine the amount of the credit, according to Boransky. The hardest will knock off $17,000, the second hardest will knock off $12,000 and the least hit will result in a credit of $2,000.

Students are really thrilled in the new decision for tuition credit made by the administration.

"I don't know if it's the sounds at night or the bugs that always seem to creep their way in through the walls, but something isn't right with the dorms on campus," she said. "Last week I was taking a shower and a man threw open the curtain to look at me. At the time I believed it was just another perverted prank, but after all this, I think it may have actually been the spirit of a Native American shaman trying to scare us into leaving the building."

In any event, students, like senior Mike Basforado, are taking a closer look at some of the problems that persist from day to day.

"I can't really prove it, but I'm sure this burial ground thing is directly responsible for the below-acceptable quality the SEC movies are presented in and the slump many of our athletic teams have been going through lately," he said. "I'm sure if we just agree to cooperate with the ANUS, our Rugby Lady Broncs will finally win a MAAC tournament."

Multicultural Center Graduate Assistant Moira Panning said that the only truly respectful thing to do at this point would be to move the campus to a place far away from the burrial grounds of Lawrenceville where any Rider student would be glad to move… Calgary, Alberta, Canada.

"Just think about how wonderful it would be moving our school to Canada," she smiled. "Not only will we be able to ski, sled, snowboard and say cool words like 'bout and 'boots', but we'll fit right in with our new Canadian president."

"As soon as I heard that Rider was offering "The Evolutionary History of Cheese," I knew it was the school for me," said Billy Bob Goode.

ANUS

from page 1

harder and harder and cafeteria food will continue to nauseate." University President Bartus Lucious said Rider has a tradition of excellence in the Lawrenceville community and does not plan to relocate.

"We have been struggling to shake free our problems with ANUS for quite some time now, but we just haven't been successful in wiping clean all of their suspicions with our willingness to meet a compromise," Lucious said.

However, University decision-makers would be smart to listen to the rumblings of the ANUS according to junior Dawn Martin, who said that residence halls have always been a very scary place to live.

"I don't know if it's the sounds at night or the bugs that always seem to creep their way in through the walls, but something isn't right with the dorms on campus," she said. "Last week I was taking a shower and a man threw open the curtain to look at me. At the time I believed it was just another perverted prank, but after all this, I think it may have actually been the spirit of a Native American shaman trying to scare us into leaving the building."

In any event, students, like senior Mike Basforado, are taking a closer look at some of the problems that persist from day to day.

"I can't really prove it, but I'm sure this burial ground thing is directly responsible for the below-acceptable quality the SEC movies are presented in and the slump many of our athletic teams have been going through lately," he said. "I'm sure if we just agree to cooperate with the ANUS, our Rugby Lady Broncs will finally win a MAAC tournament."

Multicultural Center Graduate Assistant Moira Panning said that the only truly respectful thing to do at this point would be to move the campus to a place far away from the burrial grounds of Lawrenceville where any Rider student would be glad to move… Calgary, Alberta, Canada.

"Just think about how wonderful it would be moving our school to Canada," she smiled. "Not only will we be able to ski, sled, snowboard and say cool words like 'bout and 'boots', but we'll fit right in with our new Canadian president."

Rider institutes classes for morons; enrollment high

By Buffy Sass

Boss

In an ongoing effort to make classes easier and more enjoyable for students, Rider has unveiled its plan to offer a series of pre-introductory courses for incoming freshmen and upperclassmen who are behind.

These courses, such as "Math for Dummies" and "The Economics of Piggy Banks," are meant to bridge the gap between high school and college.

"We want to make the transition smooth for our new students," said Dudley Lear, author of "Dumb or Just Really Stupid?" and the brains behind the new courses. "Acing an easier course builds confidence for students with a chance to be able to come back to the University. That's why we are putting in effect money students with a chance to be able to come back to the University. That's why we are putting in effect money students with a chance to be able to come back to the University. That's why we are putting in effect money students with a chance to be able to come back to the..."

Students have been complaining about the increase in tuition; however, they will now be able to receive a credit towards their bill if they "mow down" a pedestrian, according to Lala Binks, director of Student Financial Aid Services.

The new decision was implemented because of the recent thousand-dollar increase in tuition by the newly employed president of the University.

"We needed to be able to pay our staff better wages and what a better way to do that than raise the tuition again," said president elect Morpheus. "Basically if the students can give us a reason we will give them a credit."

Depending on how hard the person is hit will determine the amount of the credit, according to Boransky. The hardest will knock off $17,000, the second hardest will knock off $12,000 and the least hit will result in a credit of $2,000.

Students are really thrilled in the new decision for tuition credit made by the administration.

"I don't know if it's the sounds at night or the bugs that always seem to creep their way in through the walls, but something isn't right with the dorms on campus," she said. "Last week I was taking a shower and a man threw open the curtain to look at me. At the time I believed it was just another perverted prank, but after all this, I think it may have actually been the spirit of a Native American shaman trying to scare us into leaving the building."

In any event, students, like senior Mike Basforado, are taking a closer look at some of the problems that persist from day to day.

"I can't really prove it, but I'm sure this burial ground thing is directly responsible for the below-acceptable quality the SEC movies are presented in and the slump many of our athletic teams have been going through lately," he said. "I'm sure if we just agree to cooperate with the ANUS, our Rugby Lady Broncs will finally win a MAAC tournament."

Multicultural Center Graduate Assistant Moira Panning said that the only truly respectful thing to do at this point would be to move the campus to a place far away from the burrial grounds of Lawrenceville where any Rider student would be glad to move… Calgary, Alberta, Canada.

"Just think about how wonderful it would be moving our school to Canada," she smiled. "Not only will we be able to ski, sled, snowboard and say cool words like 'bout and 'boots', but we'll fit right in with our new Canadian president."

"As soon as I heard that Rider was offering "The Evolutionary History of Cheese," I knew it was the school for me," said Billy Bob Goode.

Students offered fun new way to pay tuition

By Yoda FlakeValve

Sub-Boss

Students have been complaining about the increase in tuition; however, they will now be able to receive a credit towards their bill if they "mow down" a pedestrian, according to Lala Binks, director of Student Financial Aid Services.

The new decision was implemented because of the recent thousand-dollar increase in tuition by the newly employed president of the University.

"We needed to be able to pay our staff better wages and what a better way to do that than raise the tuition again," said president elect Morpheus. "Basically if the students can give us a reason we will give them a credit."

Depending on how hard the person is hit will determine the amount of the credit, according to Boransky. The hardest will knock off $17,000, the second hardest will knock off $12,000 and the least hit will result in a credit of $2,000.

Students are really thrilled in the new decision for tuition credit made by the administration.

"Well I've hit people before in the past, but now it's great because I get money off of my tuition," said Morton Salt. "It makes me pay more attention when I drive."

Dr. Chocolata Cake, head administrator in Financial Services felt that this was a needed decision. "Crazy jay-walkers on campus have been a problem for years," said Cake. "This way we can help students pay tuition and kill the crazy jay-walkers."