patchwork plagiarism, which is submission of work that has been constructed by piecing together phrases or sentences from unacknowledged sources, ghostwriting, which is a false claim of ownership, and word-for-word copying. They are all considered types of academic dishonesty.

“I think that there has been an increase in plagiarism,” said freshman Jill Loveland. “But we’re in college now and it’s taken more seriously. I wouldn’t do it. It’s really easy to get caught.”

Possible consequences of academic dishonesty include resubmitting work, receiving an incomplete in the class, receiving a failing grade in the class and possible suspension or dismissal from the University, according to The Source.

Vice-President of Student Affairs Anthony Campbell said that an honor code may be one way to lower the amount of cheating at Rider. He spoke to faculty about it at LeMasney’s presentation.

“I got a list of faculty who was interested and I got a list of faculty who was interested and about plagiarism, why it is wrong and its consequences,” said Millen.

Morse, who now discusses the effects of plagiarism with her students, agreed. “I’m really glad that the University is taking such proactive steps regarding plagiarism,” she said, “because we can’t accept this and we need
