The actions against Internet music sharing have struck Rider University as students on both the Lawrenceville and Westminster campuses have been targeted by the industry. The Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA) has notified the Office of Information Technologies (OIT) of five students, three within the last month, who have violated copyright law by using the Rider network to upload illegally pirated songs to others, said Associate Vice President for Student Affairs Anthony Campbell.

"Nobody has access to our network outside of Rider, but the RIAA has embedded different things into their songs that allow them to monitor where they go," he said. "If it's their copyrighted material, they can track the IP address of where it goes and see that the IP address is owned by Rider University. From there, the University is required to disable their music downloading capabilities and send a letter informing the student of what has happened."

When students' downloading capabilities are shut down, the rest of their Internet access remains intact, according to OIT Networks/Communications Director Timothy Fairlie. "We have network management tools that can, in most cases, identify the types of traffic on the network and where they are coming from and going to," he said. "These tools can usually block those specific types of traffic without shutting the user's connection down completely."

While no legal action is taken at this point in the process, if a student is caught repeatedly breaking the policy, the person is identified and the owner of the copyrighted material is then entitled to seek monetary compensation that can exceed $150,000. Currently, accord-

H.A.H.A sponsored sandwich-making for the homeless all day yesterday in designated locations, including the Gill Chapel.

By Randy Townsend

The Hunger And Homelessness Awareness (H.A.H.A.) organization has been sponsoring a series of events in order to drive home the idea that the spirit of giving should not be restricted to the holidays. The "unrecognized" organization has celebrated National Hunger And Homelessness Awareness Week, which lasts through Nov. 15-19, by trying to motivate the Rider community to be more generous to people who are less fortunate.

"We want all student voices to be heard to make up for the many voices that are never heard, such as homeless children and veterans without health care," said Mary Ann Somaine, co-president of H.A.H.A. "Our surrounding community needs help."

On Monday, H.A.H.A. held an event that asked the faculty, staff and students to "arrest" the expansion of hunger and homelessness in the local community.

Participants were asked to raise their own "bail" to get out of "jail." The money raised was donated to HomeFront, a Lawrenceville organization that addresses the needs of Mercer County's homeless. The events are a way to get the Rider community to understand the needs of the less fortunate, said Melissa Borotto, H.A.H.A. co-president. "I've been volunteering in Trenton for the past four years," said Borotto. "I think a lot of people take for granted that they have a home that they can go to."

H.A.H.A. volunteers helped prepare packages for Wednesday night's Midnight Run, a monthly event that delivers provisions to Manhattan's homeless population. They helped make blankets and scarves for the New York area homeless.

H.A.H.A. sponsored sandwich-making for the homeless all day yesterday in designated locations, including the Gill Chapel.

See ‘H.A.H.A.,’ page 4

By Vincent Civitillo

The actions against Internet music sharing have struck Rider University as students on both the Lawrenceville and Westminster campuses have been targeted by the industry. The Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA) has notified the Office of Information Technologies (OIT) of five students, three within the last month, who have violated copyright law by using the Rider network to upload illegally pirated songs to others, said Associate Vice President for Student Affairs Anthony Campbell.

"Nobody has access to our network outside of Rider, but the RIAA has embedded different things into their songs that allow them to monitor where they go," he said. "If it's their copyrighted material, they can track the IP address of where it goes and see that the IP address is owned by Rider University. From there, the University is required to disable their music downloading capabilities and send a letter informing the student of what has happened."

When students' downloading capabilities are shut down, the rest of their Internet access remains intact, according to OIT Networks/Communications Director Timothy Fairlie. "We have network management tools that can, in most cases, identify the types of traffic on the network and where they are coming from and going to," he said. "These tools can usually block those specific types of traffic without shutting the user's connection down completely."

While no legal action is taken at this point in the process, if a student is caught repeatedly breaking the policy, the person is identified and the owner of the copyrighted material is then entitled to seek monetary compensation that can exceed $150,000. Currently, accord-

H.A.H.A sponsored sandwich-making for the homeless all day yesterday in designated locations, including the Gill Chapel.

By Randy Townsend

The Hunger And Homelessness Awareness (H.A.H.A.) organization has been sponsoring a series of events in order to drive home the idea that the spirit of giving should not be restricted to the holidays. The "unrecognized" organization has celebrated National Hunger And Homelessness Awareness Week, which lasts through Nov. 15-19, by trying to motivate the Rider community to be more generous to people who are less fortunate.

"We want all student voices to be heard to make up for the many voices that are never heard, such as homeless children and veterans without health care," said Mary Ann Somaine, co-president of H.A.H.A. "Our surrounding community needs help."

On Monday, H.A.H.A. held an event that asked the faculty, staff and students to "arrest" the expansion of hunger and homelessness in the local community.

Participants were asked to raise their own "bail" to get out of "jail." The money raised was donated to HomeFront, a Lawrenceville organization that addresses the needs of Mercer County's homeless. The events are a way to get the Rider community to understand the needs of the less fortunate, said Melissa Borotto, H.A.H.A. co-president. "I've been volunteering in Trenton for the past four years," said Borotto. "I think a lot of people take for granted that they have a home that they can go to."

H.A.H.A. volunteers helped prepare packages for Wednesday night's Midnight Run, a monthly event that delivers provisions to Manhattan's homeless population. They helped make blankets and scarves for the New York area homeless.

H.A.H.A sponsored sandwich-making for the homeless all day yesterday in designated locations, including the Gill Chapel.

See ‘H.A.H.A.,’ page 4

By Vincent Civitillo

The actions against Internet music sharing have struck Rider University as students on both the Lawrenceville and Westminster campuses have been targeted by the industry. The Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA) has notified the Office of Information Technologies (OIT) of five students, three within the last month, who have violated copyright law by using the Rider network to upload illegally pirated songs to others, said Associate Vice President for Student Affairs Anthony Campbell.

"Nobody has access to our network outside of Rider, but the RIAA has embedded different things into their songs that allow them to monitor where they go," he said. "If it's their copyrighted material, they can track the IP address of where it goes and see that the IP address is owned by Rider University. From there, the University is required to disable their music downloading capabilities and send a letter informing the student of what has happened."

When students' downloading capabilities are shut down, the rest of their Internet access remains intact, according to OIT Networks/Communications Director Timothy Fairlie. "We have network management tools that can, in most cases, identify the types of traffic on the network and where they are coming from and going to," he said. "These tools can usually block those specific types of traffic without shutting the user's connection down completely."

While no legal action is taken at this point in the process, if a student is caught repeatedly breaking the policy, the person is identified and the owner of the copyrighted material is then entitled to seek monetary compensation that can exceed $150,000. Currently, accord-

H.A.H.A sponsored sandwich-making for the homeless all day yesterday in designated locations, including the Gill Chapel.

By Randy Townsend

The Hunger And Homelessness Awareness (H.A.H.A.) organization has been sponsoring a series of events in order to drive home the idea that the spirit of giving should not be restricted to the holidays. The "unrecognized" organization has celebrated National Hunger And Homelessness Awareness Week, which lasts through Nov. 15-19, by trying to motivate the Rider community to be more generous to people who are less fortunate.

"We want all student voices to be heard to make up for the many voices that are never heard, such as homeless children and veterans without health care," said Mary Ann Somaine, co-president of H.A.H.A. "Our surrounding community needs help."

On Monday, H.A.H.A. held an event that asked the faculty, staff and students to "arrest" the expansion of hunger and homelessness in the local community.

Participants were asked to raise their own "bail" to get out of "jail." The money raised was donated to HomeFront, a Lawrenceville organization that addresses the needs of Mercer County's homeless. The events are a way to get the Rider community to understand the needs of the less fortunate, said Melissa Borotto, H.A.H.A. co-president. "I've been volunteering in Trenton for the past four years," said Borotto. "I think a lot of people take for granted that they have a home that they can go to."

H.A.H.A. volunteers helped prepare packages for Wednesday night's Midnight Run, a monthly event that delivers provisions to Manhattan's homeless population. They helped make blankets and scarves for the New York area homeless.

H.A.H.A sponsored sandwich-making for the homeless all day yesterday in designated locations, including the Gill Chapel.

By Randy Townsend

The Hunger And Homelessness Awareness (H.A.H.A.) organization has been sponsoring a series of events in order to drive home the idea that the spirit of giving should not be restricted to the holidays. The "unrecognized" organization has celebrated National Hunger And Homelessness Awareness Week, which lasts through Nov. 15-19, by trying to motivate the Rider community to be more generous to people who are less fortunate.

"We want all student voices to be heard to make up for the many voices that are never heard, such as homeless children and veterans without health care," said Mary Ann Somaine, co-president of H.A.H.A. "Our surrounding community needs help."

On Monday, H.A.H.A. held an event that asked the faculty, staff and students to "arrest" the expansion of hunger and homelessness in the local community.

Participants were asked to raise their own "bail" to get out of "jail." The money raised was donated to HomeFront, a Lawrenceville organization that addresses the needs of Mercer County's homeless. The events are a way to get the Rider community to understand the needs of the less fortunate, said Melissa Borotto, H.A.H.A. co-president. "I've been volunteering in Trenton for the past four years," said Borotto. "I think a lot of people take for granted that they have a home that they can go to."

H.A.H.A. volunteers helped prepare packages for Wednesday night's Midnight Run, a monthly event that delivers provisions to Manhattan's homeless population. They helped make blankets and scarves for the New York area homeless.

H.A.H.A sponsored sandwich-making for the homeless all day yesterday in designated locations, including the Gill Chapel.